This is one of the few French songs that have managed to cross the language barrier and been taken up enthusiastically by non-French groups. The refrain at least is known to a great many English-speaking soldiers, sailors, airmen, and university students. The words are almost identical with "Gai lon la, gai le rosier" (see page 38), but both the rhythm and the melody are quite different. It is said to have been a children's song originally, but during the war with Holland it became popular with the soldiers as a marching song and has been so used in almost every war since.
